In general, the arts—dance, painting, architecture, music, literature—are valued not only for their intrinsic aesthetic qualities, but also because they force us to ask penetrating questions about human values, our alleged knowledge of reality, and the nature of reality itself. This course will explore how all of this is true of film. We will use film as a medium for thinking through some perennial philosophical problems.